

Asynchronous Module: The Human Person Facing Death

Lawrence Gabutero IC12A

Activity 1: The Awareness of Finitude

Thinking about my own death makes me realize how fragile life really is. It is not something I think about every day, but when I do, it makes me stop and reflect on how I am spending my time. The thought that my life could end at any moment reminds me to slow down and appreciate the present instead of rushing to chase things that might not even matter in the end. It pushes me to be more patient with others, to say thank you more often, and to express love while I still can. This week, I plan to focus more on meaningful actions, like spending time with my family, doing my tasks sincerely, and avoiding negativity. Knowing that my time on earth is limited gives my days more depth. It makes every ordinary moment feel special because I am aware that each one will never come again.

Activity 2: Existentialism and Meaning

The song I chose is “About You” by The 1975. This song captures the feeling of remembering someone who once meant everything, showing how love and memory continue to shape who we are even after time has passed. Using Viktor Frankl’s framework, the song represents Experiential Values because it focuses on how deep emotions and shared experiences can give meaning to life. The lyrics speak of nostalgia, love, and the lasting impact of human connection. It reminds us that meaning does not only exist in happiness but also in longing and remembrance. Through this song, I realized that love and memory are powerful experiences that give color to our existence. Even when people or moments fade, the feelings they leave behind continue to make life meaningful.

Activity 3: The Weight of Choice

A recent major decision I made was choosing to continue studying even when I felt tired and discouraged. This choice was authentic because it was based on my own values and long-term goals. I knew it would be difficult, but I chose to move forward because education is important to me and to my family’s future. I did not let the fear of failure or the opinions of others control my decision. I took responsibility for my choice, knowing that this is part of becoming the person I truly want to be.

Asynchronous Module: The Human Person Facing Death

Lawrence Gabutero IC12A

Activity 4: Socrates and Core Values

The Resume of Achievement:

- Earn a college degree and graduate with honors.
- Build a stable and successful career.
- Have financial independence and support my family.
- Travel to different places and experience new cultures.
- Be recognized for my hard work and dedication.

The Epitaph of Meaning:

The Epitaph of Meaning:

- Lived with love, honesty, and kindness.
- Inspired others through simple acts of goodness.
- Never gave up despite pain and challenges.
- Found joy in helping and understanding others.
- Left behind memories of courage and compassion.

When I look at both lists, I realize that while achievements bring satisfaction, the Epitaph of Meaning truly represents what I want my life to stand for. Material success fades, but the way I treat people and the impact I leave behind will last longer. My long-term decisions should be guided by love, faith, and character rather than fame or wealth. The list of meaning reminds me that a fulfilled life is not measured by trophies or titles but by the goodness I share with others.

Asynchronous Module: The Human Person Facing Death

Lawrence Gabutero IC12A

Activity 5: Dialogue and Synthesis

In my conversations with others, I see that everyone's meaning of life is different, yet we all share the same desire to be valued and understood. Through dialogue, I realize that meaning grows when it is shared. My relationships help me understand myself better, and they test the values I claim to believe in. Being in a community allows me to practice empathy, respect, and authenticity. It is through others that I see my purpose more clearly, which is to love, to help, and to live a life that contributes something good to the world.

Activity 6: Final Performance Output (The Philosophical Life Plan)

Facing the idea of death does not make me hopeless; instead, it awakens me to live more purposefully. Finitude reminds me that life is not endless, and because of that, every moment matters. My authentic path means choosing what is true to my heart even when it is not easy. My core values such as faith, kindness, courage, and honesty guide me toward a meaningful existence. I want to live not just to achieve but to become someone who loves deeply and lives truthfully. In the end, I hope to be remembered not for what I had, but for how I lived and the love I shared.