

3-Day Civic Action Journal

Day 1 – Community Clean-Up

What I did: I joined a community clean-up drive around our barangay.

Why I did it: I wanted to help make our surroundings cleaner and encourage others to care for our environment.

How it contributes to society: Keeping public areas clean helps prevent diseases, promotes discipline, and builds a sense of community pride.

Day 2 – Recycling at Home

What I did: I separated plastic bottles, papers, and cans from household waste and brought them to the recycling area.

Why I did it: I believe that proper waste management reduces pollution and conserves natural resources.

How it contributes to society: Recycling helps protect the environment, reduces landfill waste, and inspires others to live sustainably.

Day 3 – Helping a Neighbor

What I did: I helped an elderly neighbor carry groceries and clean her front yard.

Why I did it: I wanted to show kindness and make her day a little easier.

How it contributes to society: Helping neighbors strengthens community bonds, promotes compassion, and creates a caring and supportive environment.

Discussion: What does active citizenship look like in a digital world?

Active citizenship in the digital world means using technology responsibly to promote positive change and community involvement. It includes participating in online discussions respectfully, signing digital petitions for social causes, sharing verified information, and supporting digital campaigns that raise awareness about important issues. Being an active digital citizen also means protecting one's privacy, avoiding the spread of fake news, and using social media platforms to inspire others to act for the common good. In today's connected world, active citizenship is not just about what we do offline, but also how we use our digital voice to make society more informed, responsible, and united.
